FALLING IN LOVE IS NOT AT ALL LIKE FALLING

EXCERPT

After throwing another log onto the dwindling embers, she sank down onto the loveseat to think some more.

Again, she downplayed her sexual awareness to Alex by thinking that any woman could be attracted to him.

On the other hand, this was the first time she had awakened from a dream experiencing that long absent sensation of arousal. And now that it was here, she was completely turned on, even now, when she should be free of the aftereffects of any dream. It was lingering like no dream should, exerting power that some waking moments of her life had never had.

Remembering her dream, she involuntarily closed her eyes, recalling vivid images inside her head.

Her eyes popped open again as she felt her cheeks growing hot. Oh no, it would be a big mistake to start dwelling on those images as she was starting her job with him!

How could she honestly work when those images were just stored there, and could pop out at the most unexpected and unwelcome moments while she was with him? Should she even start work like this?
