Sins of Our Fathers David Dickey

Nelson House is a rising basketball prodigy from the ghetto. Katie Graham is a college student looking to find her way in life. Bruce Heartland is a confident 20-something who has inherited a life of privilege and tremendous riches. What could possibly unite these three young people, all from such incredibly different backgrounds? Death of course, or at least the sudden and unexpected prospect of it. Scientists had been warning humanity for some time that it was a matter of when, not if. Now it had come true. A horribly lethal new virus had leaped from beast to man and rapidly reached its tentacles to nearly every corner of the globe. There was no cure, there was no vaccine, and there wouldn't be for some months, maybe years.

The worst part was that it only infected a certain kind of person; everyone who fell ill was a young person in their teens or 20's. The race to develop a treatment and vaccine is on in full force. Dr. Gregory, head of the CDC, along with President Martinez and others are frantically racing to save the world's youth from a mass extinction. Nelson, Katie, and Bruce will each end up playing major roles in this process, even if they never realize what happened. They may be from different worlds, but their unlikely, interconnected story will be the one that matters in determining much of the world's fate. Sins of Our Fathers sheds light on the way the life we are born into affects the life we will live and ultimately the death we will face, while showing us all that whether we like it or not when it really comes down to it we're all interconnected, some for the better, some for the worse.
