This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text. Purchasers can download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1905 Excerpt: ...this: A consular officer is called upon, generally, to submit his views on the possible introduction with profit into his district of certain articles of American manufacture or production; this is perhaps the most common kind of report which is required in the service. Or a consular officer occasionally is directed to report on labor conditions, on emigration, on the methods and details of some industry, and the like. Lastly, there is the so-called "Annual Report," which covers the general yearly commercial and trade statistics of the consular territory, with details of interest to American manufacturers and exporters. In all these instances the consular officer bases his replies on personal observation and on inquiries among local dealers, manufacturers, the chambers of commerce, and local, municipal, and government officials. It is seldom that these methods fail to supply all the details which are necessary to meet the demands made by the Department of State, provided that the questions do not tend to reach too intimately into the workings of a private business. This occasionally happens, with the result that it is quite impossible to secure the desired information; nor would the intervention, in such event, of the diplomatic representative prove of the least assistance. However, in the second group of reports mentioned above, it is sometimes the case that, in order to obtain certain statistics or information, it may be necessary to have recourse to some government department, the local representative of which can not or will not supply the desired information, and it is to such exigencies that the plan evidently refers, for it is said in the circular, " It is to be understood that the Department would continue to communicate directly with c...
